Wow, is this the end? This book was a looong journey that I could not have done alone. I am fortunate to be blessed with a loving family, amazing friends and inspiring people that accompanied me in various parts and ways of writing this book; and I could not have done this without their emotional, mental, and social support. Writing is tough. Writing for academia is even more of a challenge for someone like me, who has been a journalist. Some days you feel like you wrote the best paragraph and can go on a break for a week. Some days you just stare at your computer, talking to it and begging for inspiration. It's never a linear or clear path, and you never really feel it's finished. Luckily there is a deadline, and I decided to consider my books as tools to develop my thoughts rather than these perfect pieces of work. Below you can find the various people (and a special dog) that were part of my journey, but if I forgot you, know that it was because I drank a lot of alcohol to celebrate the end of this book, so it was for a good cause.

I would like to thank both of my Ph.D. supervisors—Sean Cubitt and Marianne Franklin. Sean is such a rare species in academia, always happy and smiling, curious about everything without pretentions—what I call a walking Wikipedia. Sean has always supported, encouraged and given me productive inputs, both on content and writing. As a non-native English speaker the first few years have been a challenge. Sean's generosity and patience will never be forgotten; thank you for believing in my project and always being kind to me. Marianne is a badass genius who gave me the focus I needed. She was always critical and went straight to the point; ‘tachles’ as we say in Hebrew. She provided poignant and constructive criticism, pushing me to achieve my best with the highest standards. Both Sean and Marianne’s transdisciplinary knowledge and openness to create a different approach that mixes several elements in a non-traditional way has helped me in breaking more boundaries. Thank you for your guidance while amplifying my own voice.

I would like to thank the people who I have interviewed for this book, who informed and contributed to the collection and analysis of the data. I want to thank Rosa Barcello, Head of Unit Digital Privacy and Data Protection DG CNECT—European Commission, and Raffaello Di Giovanni Bezzi, Policy Officer—European Commission. I also want to thank journalist and activist Glyn Moody and Javier Ruiz from the Open Rights Group UK at its offices in London.

Throughout my academic journey I met several scholars who I felt a special connection with and helped shape my thought and writing. I’ve met Aram Sinnreich through Twitter because he seemed to share the same passion I have to music. I ended up co-organizing a panel with him—Sonic Publics—at AoIR 2017 in Tartu, Estonia and co-editing a special issue with the same title for the International Journal of Communication. Aram has been my mentor on many occasions and his kind soul and awesome musical skills have inspired and helped me immensely. Another dear friend is Robert W. Gehl who I first met through his amazing writing, thinking “that’s exactly what I think, but why does he have to write so damn good?” We ended up co-organizing a panel—Network Standards and Culture—at AoIR 2016 in Berlin, Germany. Robert also gave fantastic feedback to this book and was super supportive along the whole way.

I also want to thank people I’ve worked with and learned from greatly, specifically Jennifer Pybus and Ben O’Loughlin. Both are great scholars, teachers and collaborators, and I hope to continue working with them in the future. I want to thank the sound studies women I’ve met throughout the years in conferences and events who have influenced my work—Hillegonda Rietveld, Mara Mills and Marie Thompson. A special thanks goes to Carolyn Birdsall, who on top of being a brilliant scholar is also an amazing friend who makes me feel like we have known each other forever. In addition, I have met people through different academic events with whom I later kept in contact because, well, they’re wonderful—Britt Paris, Joan Pedro, Becky Kazansky, and Ellen Simpson.

Yes, the rumours are true about Israelis—we tend to find each other wherever we go. Throughout my journey I’ve met amazing people from my homeland that made me want to go back just so I can work with them. Thank you Eran Fisher, Carmel Vaisman, Dan Kotliar, Nicholas John, and Noam Tirosh. There are also scholars whose work you've read and thought was brilliant, whom you later manage to connect with. Thank you Jussi Parikka, David Beer, Nancy Baym, Ben Grosser, Tiziana Terranova, Sarah T. Roberts, Anna Jobin, David Parisi, and Lina Dencik. I have found these people through the various communities, conferences, and events I went to or organized, but I want to emphasize the Association of Internet Researchers (AoIR) as a hub for people who do great things on and in the internet, and also just funny geeks.

I would like to thank all the Media and Communications Department at Goldsmiths, University of London where I completed my Ph.D. This unique department enabled my ideas to go in directions which might not have been allowed at other institutions. I want to thank my current workplace, the Communication and Media Department at Liverpool University, and particularly my boss Professor Simeon Yates. Sim showed me that you can be smart and kind, supportive and challenging at the same time. Sim provides a work environment where you are excited to come and share ideas with your colleagues. He makes connections between people he thinks will work well together and never forgets to give credit and gratitude where needed. In a super competitive and isolated industry like academia, I cherish these qualities everyday—Thank you Sim.

Writing a book is an emotional roller-coaster. You go up and down, and sometimes lose a sense of time, space and self. I want to thank my friends for helping me keep my sanity throughout the years, each in their own special way. I am extremely grateful to have met Helen Pritchard, who has provided wonderful feedback, debates and inspiration to many sections of this book. I am incredibly thankful to have met Lee Weinberg, who has been my soul sister, listening, supporting, cooking, laughing and always being there for me wherever she was in the world. I am also lucky to have met Nathalie Dobrzan, who made me laugh and reminded me that there is (!) a world outside academia and it is full of great (and sometimes less great) films (mostly Marvel, but we sinned with DC), Gin & Tonics, PIZZA (only VoodooRay's, of course, because the crunch factor is the most important one in food) and Dale Cooper drinking a damn fine coffee. I could not have survived this journey without Daria Ihlov and Tali Avron whom I travelled with across Europe to hike, go to concerts or party in festivals and clubs. I am thankful to other friends who contributed, each in their own way, to my mental stability: Andrea Nunez Casal, Nerea Calvillo, Naila Vázquez Tantiñá, Adi Shalev, Rotem Leshem, Merce Al Ca, Noga Alon-Stein, Madison Alexander Moore, Shiri Levi, Wessel Van Rensburg, Phaedra Shanbaum, and Frederike Kaltheuner. And I thank, of course, the best writing companion that walked me in the park whenever I needed to breathe, think or curse the air—Thelma.

Another big thank you goes to Twitter and all the people (and bots) I have debated, discussed, bitched and laughed with along the way, about politics, music, films, food and why Halt and Catch Fire is better than Mr. Robot. I know many academics think and say that Twitter is a distraction but seriously this book would not be published without it. Beyond entertainment and making me feel connected to what's happening I also got a lot of inspiration, met people, heard about conferences, new books, new music, conferences, grants, news and managed to acquire my new addiction to gifs (I mean, it is a much superior way to communicate!). Twitter is the best spam out there and I can't stop eating it.

Love it or hate it, but peer review process really helps improve your work, even if you sometimes want to kill reviewer 2. Segments of this book were published in other places, and I'm grateful for the feedback I received from the people who reviewed them. Segments of Chapter 3 appeared in an article published on Media History in 2015. In addition, segments of Chapter 4 appeared in the International Review of Law, Computers and Technology Journal in 2017, as well as an article published on Open Democracy in 2018, as part of the series Human Rights and the Internet. Segments of Chapter 5 have appeared in an article published on the International Journal of Communication.

Finally, I would like to thank my loving family, the Carmi's: my dad Amnon and my brother Amir who have always supported and gave me unconditional encouragements throughout this whole process. My brother Amir works in cybersecurity, so throughout the whole process he always gave me the 'industry' point of view and of course many important memes and gifs to keep me amused. Most of all, I want to thank my mother—Ingrid—who has always been there for me, being my rock in the highs and lows, listening, pushing, inspiring and believing in me. I couldn't have done this without you.

A final-final thanks goes to Liverpool University Open Access fund who made it possible for this book to be open access for all.
